INTERMISSION*

La Traviata—Act III. . . . . Giuseppe Verdi

Gwen Gustafson as Violetta, Nancy Vines as Annina, Gail Ginery as Alfredo Germont, Keith Riddle as Giorgio Germont, and James Ryerson as Dr. Grenvil

Violetta Valery, once a beautiful courtesan of Paris, is now fatally ill. She is still in love with Alfredo from whom she was separated by Giorgio Germont, Alfredo's father. To "preserve the family honor," Violetta had pretended to Alfredo that she loved another; he had then denounced her publicly and gone abroad.

It is now carnival time, and Annina is sent to distribute to the poor a last portion of Violetta's money. Violetta rereads the worn but treasured letter from Alfredo's father in which he tells her that he has revealed the meaning of her great sacrifice to his son and that both are coming to implore her pardon. When Alfredo arrives, Violetta rallies, believing new life and happiness will be hers; but soon after Giorgio Germont gives consent to their marriage, Violetta dies.

Saint-Saens would allow only one portion of his Carnival of the Animals to be published during his lifetime, the well-known piece for cello, "The Swan," probably because much of this music is a witty, light-hearted satire on music and musicians of his own era. For example, "Turtles" are described by simply taking a spirited tune by the French composer, Offenbach, and slowing it down to a snail's pace. Graceful ballet music by Berlioz and Mendelssohn is given to the unlikely instrument of all, the double bass, and the ponderous result is a musical description of "The Elephant." The call of "The Cuckoo" is given a true-to-life performance by a solo clarinet which intrudes just like the bird, always in the same key without regard for the beautiful, harmonic progressions by the pianos. The bray of "Personages with Long Ears" is cleverly imitated by the violins. "Pianists" are frankly described with a grand performance of finger exercises that are painfully familiar to every piano student. Perhaps the most clever description of all is that of "Fossils." We not only distinctly hear the rattle of bones but also hear a catalog of old, well-worn tunes, musical "fossils," that run the gamut from a Rossini opera aria and French folk songs to the melody from Saint-Saens' own "Danse Macabre."
